Look Out for Bashkortostan

Bashkortostan is a region of the Russian Federation. It is located in the southern Ural Mountains, just north of the border with Kazakhstan. The capital is the City of Ufa.

Earlier this week a major protest, approximately 10,000 people, erupted in the town of Baymak, not far from the border with Kazakhstan. As reported in Meduza IO, the protest was precipitated by the arrest of Fail Alsynov, a leader of the Bashkir national movement and a local environmental activist. Police from outside of Baymak were brought in, to help quell the protests. Yesterday, Meduza reported that the protest has spread to the Capital of Ufa.

A likely additional reason for the protests is the relatively large number of Bashkirs, a large ethnic minority inside Russia, who have been conscripted into the Russian Army and sent to Ukraine. Russia has been relying heavily on ethnic minorities to do the fighting in Ukraine.

As we have reported several times before, Ukrainian 5th Columnists have been operating inside Russia since 2014, the end of the Revolution of Dignity, mostly in areas populated by ethnic minorities like the Bashkirs. Their focus has been on helping ethnic minorities to protect their local language, resist the draft, and other subversive activities. Once these kinds of protests start, likely sparked by some local issue such as the opening of a gold mine near the town of Baymak, they have a tendency to spread.

There have also been protests in several towns around Moscow, the Cities of Novosibirsk and Nizhny Novgorod, over the failure of district heating systems that provide hot water and heat to residential buildings in most Russian systems. These have all happened in the middle of winter. This is a particularly sensitive time, during the run-up to the Russian presidential election.

Reporting From Ukraine

For those of you who are missing the daily “Reporting From Ukraine,” I have bad news. A couple of days ago he posted an announcement saying that he was sick, and he does not expect to report for a while. He had been taking time off, and he was about to start resuming his reports when he was taken ill. I hope he makes a full recovery and that he’d back soon!
