Russian Invasion of Ukraine

January 22, 2024

Destruction of St. Michael's Cathedral/Ukrainska Pravda

This is the latest in a series of podcasts produced by Ukrainska Pravda, documenting theft and cultural appropriation by the Russians against Ukraine and Ukrainians going back hundreds of years. The series is entitled “Why do they Steal?” You will find links to each episode of the series.

St. Michael's Cathedral has stood on the high ground in Kyiv since the 12th Century. For those who have been to Kyiv, St. Michael's stands on one end of a broad street, with St. Sophia's Cathedral on the other end. In front of St. Michael's is the statue of Queen Olga, where couples about to be married (including us) go to pay tribute. Today, next to St. Michael's there are memorials to the victims of the 1932 & 1933 Famine, and a memorial to Ukrainian soldiers who lost their lives fighting the Russians.

During Euromaidan St. Michael's served as a sanctuary and triage center for protesters wounded and injured in the fighting in and near Independence Square. The bells of St. Michael's have been rung only twice to warn of an invasion, in 1240 during the Mongol sack of Kyiv, and in December 2013, during Euromaidan, warning of the attack of Interior Ministry police against the protestors on Independence Square.

By Violating Sovereign Law, the Sovereign Forfeits Sovereign Immunity and Remedies

During Soviet times there was a plan to create a grand plaza, along the lines of Red Square in Moscow, going from St. Michael's to St. Sophia's. In the 1930s, to make room for the grand plaza where May Day parades would be held, it was decided to destroy both St. Michael's and St. Sophia's. St. Michael's was destroyed but, according to a story that I heard, the Socialist Prime Minister of France, Leon Blum, talked Stalin out of destroying St. Sophia's. After Ukraine's independence in 1991, St. Michael's was rebuilt.

Russia's history of stealing extends not only to religious and cultural artifacts but to the dead like Prince Potemkin, the living such as approximately 20,000 Ukrainian children who have been abducted to Russia by Russian invaders, washing machines and women's underwear from houses of Ukrainians, a raccoon from the Kherson Zoo and, as we have found out, money that was supposed to be spent on military modernization.

Stealing must be in the Russians' DNA.

The Latest Denys

Yesterday, Denys provided an excellent account of the bombing of the oil terminal near St. Petersburg, along with proof of sanctions busting involving oil exports. Today, starting at 12:40 into his video, Denys provides another one of those useless fantasies of Russia's predicted invasion against Europe. It harkens back to maps produced by the late lamented Stratfor and others, showing the predicted Russian invasions of Ukraine in both 2014 and 2022, illustrated by the usual squiggly lines going from east to west. How did those work out? Sometimes, the pundits have too much time on their hands.
