News From the Battlefield

"Reporting From Ukraine" appears to believe that Russia has concluded that Avdiivka is a lost cause, at least in the short term, and that they're moving troops up to Bakhmut, or "Bakhmut 2." He reports that Russia now has approximately 8,000 troops in positions east of Bakhmut.

Russia appears to be desperate to show some kind of breakthrough during the period leading up to elections in Russia, and it doesn't matter to them where the breakthrough would take place. There is thrust and parry all up and down the line, from the Dnipro Crossing to Kupiansk in the north.

For its part, Ukraine seems content to killing as many Russians as they can, and continue hitting Russian logistics. Recent destruction of Russian ammo dumps and fuel supply depots, mostly near Donetsk City, has apparently stopped Russia's Avdiivka Offensive in its tracks.

The news I am getting from the Senate, related in yesterday's email, implies that Putin is doing everything he can, using social media, to lean on Republican members of Congress to withhold continued support to Ukraine. Whether or not he's trying to engage Donald Trump in this effort is unclear. The risk to Russia is that when (likely) the U.S. resumes military aid to Ukraine that will include weapons that the U.S. has previously withheld, such as longer range ATACMS missiles armed with unitary warheads capable of cutting the Kerch Bridge, rendering Crimea to a marginal military asset for Russia.

Putin is also continuing to count on the "newspapers of record" (NY Times, Washington Post, Wall St. Journal) to continue to write articles entitled "failed offensive," "stalemate," that he hopes have effect in convincing members of Congress to stop throwing good money after bad, where the U.S. investment in ensuring Ukraine's freedom has the additional benefit of degrading Russia. The "newspapers of record" are populated by senior editors and reporters with long experience in Russia and, conversely, little or no experience in Ukraine, who believe that Russia cannot be beaten by Ukraine, and they go about writing articles supporting their assertion.

The Frozen Russian Central Bank Assets

As U.S. support for Ukraine has hit a temporary snag, more attention is being given to confiscating or re-purposing over $300 billion in frozen Russian Central Bank assets for use in supporting Ukraine. Here are 2 recent articles, from Ukrainian Pravda and today's New York Times.

The current pause in U.S. support of Ukraine is a symptom of a larger truth – Western taxpayers have limits on their ability to provide continued support to Ukraine. The corollary is - leaving $300 billion in Russian Central Bank assets, plus accrued interest, untouched is a non-starter with Western taxpayers who, in large numbers, continue to support Ukraine.

This seems to be finally dawning on the bureaucratic handwringers in Washington, London, and Brussels who, until recently, weren't doing much, other than providing reasons why frozen Russian Central Bank assets should remain untouched. It is likely that the U.S. Congress will see a way to continue to supply Ukraine with weapons but, non-military support for Ukraine, including reconstruction, is another matter. There is also large bi-partisan support in the U.S. Congress to provide the Administration with the necessary authorization allowing them to use frozen Russian Central Bank assets to support Ukraine.
