

On daddy having more children

Progressives don't believe in children. There are already too many human vermin destroying their beloved Gaia. We should avoid them altogether. If we must, we should at least be adopting surplus Africans from orphanages rather than having our own.

They equally love to signal their virtue. They express their contempt for us deplorables who hold to traditional values. The fact that such moral pygmies would want our children to grow up to be like us, form traditional families and give us grandchildren more or less the same, is prima facie evidence that we are racists, homophobes and sexists.

The millennial generation is not reproducing itself or its received culture. It is not forming stable marriages. Young people do not want to subject themselves to the kind of family obligations that come with marriage and raising children. When push comes to shove, women prefer the excitement of career to the unsung glories of motherhood. Men, observing that sex is quite readily available, young women programmed to be irrational and excessively demanding, and that divorce is extraordinarily expensive and unfair, simply avoid the whole affair. No kids, and those that do show up are not imbued with the culture their parents have been taught to despise.

Western society's cultural heroes – think Madonna and Johnny Depp - are perpetual adolescents. When an older guy like me, defiantly identifying as an adult, forms a traditional marriage with the traditional objective of raising traditional children, it is an affront to every god in the progressive pantheon. They ascribe to me every vile motivation, using every pernicious pejorative in the progressive lexicon.

I don't care. Living well is the best revenge. The bitterest pill of all has to be that my life is enjoyable and has a purpose. Without a word of response to their calumny I vindicate myself.
